The Theory and Interpretation of Narrative Series

James Phelan and Peter J. Rabinowitz, Editors

The series publishes studies of narrative that offer interpretations of particular narratives and address significant theoretical issues underlying those interpretations. The series is interested in new interpretations of narratives to the extent that these interpretations are grounded in theoretical discussions that have implications for our understanding of narrative in general or for the interpretation of other narratives. The series does not privilege any one theoretical perspective but is open to studies from any strong theoretical position. It especially welcomes works that investigate the relations among different theoretical perspectives on narrative.

Psychological Politics of the American Dream: The Commodification of Subjectivity in Twentieth-Century American Literature
