I would like to thank the people and institutions who have helped make possible the completion of this project.

I am most deeply obliged to John Clubbe, whose suggestion that I edit the Hobhouse letters is but one among many happy inspirations he has given; Virginia Murray, who has been unfailingly generous and patient in hunting out manuscripts, arranging for photocopies, and answering queries; and Leslie Marchand, whose edition of the Byron letters has been indispensable, both as model and as resource.

I thank Sir Charles Hobhouse and John Murray for allowing publication of the Hobhouse letters, and the British Library (Department of Manuscripts) and New York Public Library (Berg Collection) for permitting quotation from Hobhouse manuscript diaries in their collections.

I am grateful for the financial support provided by Duke University in the form of a Mellon Post-doctoral Fellowship and by Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University through a Summer Humanities Research Grant and an Educational Foundation Supplemental Grant.

My annotations are more complete and accurate thanks to the knowledge and kindness of others, especially Tolly Boatwright, T. A. J. Burnett, Doris Langley Moore, Agnes Michael, and John Sharp. I also appreciate the efforts of those colleagues at V.P.I. and S.U., notably Christopher Clausen, Arthur Eastman, James Hoge, Fritz Oehlschlaeger, and Alison Sulloway, who have read the manuscript and offered suggestions. And last, I heartily thank Charlotte Carroll, Robert Demorest, Kathryn Videon Graham, and Marion Graham for their help in what Hobhouse would call the "intricate affair" of fashioning a book from a paper chaos.
"The Bulldogs will be very agreeable—I have only those of this country who though good—and ready to fly at any thing—yet have not the tenacity of tooth and Stoicism in endurance of my canine fellow citizens. . . ."—Lord Byron to John Murray. Ravenna, 21 February 1820
