Acknowledgments

Earlier versions of these essays appeared in The Bulletin of the New York Public Library, New Feminist Essays on Virginia Woolf (Nebraska University Press, 1981), Signs, Women's Studies, The Bucknell Review, Feminist Studies, Tulsa Studies in Women's Literature, Marxist Perspectives, and Critical Inquiry. The most substantial addition is a long section on To The Lighthouse called “Reading as Desire II” in “Still Practice.” Without David Erdman's encouragement, helpful advice, and severe criticism these essays would not exist. I would like to thank the staffs of the Newberry Library, Chicago, and Northwestern University Library for many years of courteous help, the editors of the above journals and their feminist readers, the members of the Newberry Library Feminist Criticism Seminar, Portia, my students at SUNY, Stony Brook and the University of Texas, the American Council of Learned Societies, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the lupine critics, the University Research Institute of the University of Texas, my patient family, Alice Fox, who first suggested that these essays should be collected as a book, and the anonymous readers for the Miami University Editorial Board for their helpful critiques.
