In its protracted gestation this book has benefited by my conversations with many colleagues, friends, and relatives, especially William J. Brandt, Jules Chametzky, Donald R. Howard, Roberta Markels, and Harold R. Walley. My greatest debts are to my teacher Leonard Unger, who provided the example of his own criticism and who shared his thought with me while directing the studies from which the book has taken shape; and to my colleagues Richard D. Altick, Robert M. Estrich, and my wife Joan Webber, who read the several versions of the manuscript with a rigor that saved me from much error, and a responsiveness that taught me new facets of my argument. The book's remaining deficiencies are, of course, entirely my responsibility.
